London, February 1.

The Concluſion of the Marquis de Langalerie's Manifeſto.

BEing weary of Confinement, and deſirous to enjoy ſometimes the Sweets of Liberty, I procur'd a Protection from the moſt ſerene Republick by Means of one of the chief Nobles of Venice.

The 15th of February the Chevalier de Vincelles made me a Viſit, when there happen'd to be 12 Officers with me at my Lodgings; but they immediately withdrew becauſe he deſir'd to ſpeak with me in private, and that only M. Sebret a Collonel of Foot ſhould be by, to be Witneſs to his Delivery of a Meſſage that the Abbot be Pompone Ambaſſador of France had ſent me by him: The Purport of it was, That he thought it ſtrange I ſhould cauſe my ſelf to be attended in the Streets and in Gondolaes, by Guards and Footmen arm'd, as he was inform'd I had for ſome Days. I confeſs that in ſpite of the cool Temper I had conſtantly kept among ſo many Outrages and Perſecutions, I could not contain my ſelf at the hearing theſe Words: I told him roundly of the Deſign that had been laid to ſieze me; and to juſtify what I ſaid I produc'd the Note written by an unknown Perſon, which I inſerted above. Doubtleſs he did not expect to find me ſo well inform'd of his Plots; and to vindicate himſelf, he us'd ſuch horrid Oaths and Imprecations, that inſtead of perſwading me to believe him, he only confirm'd me in my Opinion of his Guilt. Perceiving therefore that I made little Account of what he ſaid, he appeal'd to Collonel Sebret, and what ſurpriz'd me yet more was, that the Collonel did not open his Mouth to give him any other Anſwer than I don't know, ſaid he, whether you have Order to ſize the Marquis de Langalerie; but I know very well, that ſuch an Order is like to come from Court within theſe 4 Days, if it be not come already.

That ingenuous Confeſſion ſufficiently ſhews whether I had Reaſon or not to be upon my Guard; 'tis but too certain, the grand Deſign was to ſieze and carry me off; and the ſame Perſecutor who had commanded the doing it, would infallibly have pick'd out of my Conduct Colour enough for laying the Crime of High Treaſon to my Charge; which Accuſation tho' never ſo falſe, yet back'd by his Credit which is known to be all-powerful, could not but coſt me my Head, or perpetual Impriſonment at leaſt; both which Extremities it equally concern'd me to avoid: And indeed I was confirm'd in this Apprehenſion by Intelligence that was given me at 2 a Clock the ſame Morning, and which I ſuppoſe came from the ſame Perſon who gave me the firſt.

It may well be ſuppos'd that ſuch black Contrivances againſt me kept my Thoughts continually working, and that the Deſire of Revenge which ſuch violent Perſecutions naturally ſtir up, often counterbalanc'd all my Duty and Affection to my King and Country. I check'd ſuch Thoughts however, and ſuppreſſing, tho' with great Difficulty, all Suggeſtions to Vengeance, I hearken'd to the Dictates of my Reaſon, and reſolv'd to make one Effort more before I caſt off all Regard to thoſe Obligations and Duties which I had always diſcharg'd with ſo much Zeal and Fidelity. Accordingly I drew up a Letter to the Duke of Vendome, whoſe Favour and Protection I had thoroughly experienc'd; which Letter was to this Purpoſe.

'That while his Highneſs had the Goodneſs to be 'endeavouring to ſerve me at Court, as he had been 'pleas'd to promiſe me, and while I was ſojourning in 'Venice on the Publick Faith, waiting the Succeſs 'of his good Offices, I had learnt from ſeveral Hand, 'that a Deſign was form'd againſt my Perſon: but 'that if he would promiſe to protect me from any ill 'Treatment, and aſſure me of the King's Juſtice and 'Favour, I was ready notwithſtanding all that had 'paſs'd, to devote, as I had done formerly, my Life 'to his Service.

I put this Letter, which was not ſeal'd cloſe down, into the Hands of the Father Guardian of the Recollects and Almoner of the Army in Lombardy, who was by Accident at Venice; deſiring him to preſent it to the Ambaſſador of France, and to intreat him in my Name to cauſe it to be conveigh'd to his ſaid Highneſs; flattering my ſelf that he would be pleas'd with ſuch a Mark of my Confidence in him, and not refuſe me a Kindneſs that would coſt him nothing: But it was ſtriking a Rock; he receiv'd the Letter with Contempt, and after he had caus'd it to be read to him by M. de Sebret, he ſent it back agen, telling the Father Guardian, that Monſieur de Langallerie was undone paſt Hopes of Recovery; ſeeing that very Evening, he had in Quality of Ambaſſador writ to the King that he had made an Agreement with the Emperour to ſerve him.

It cannot be doubted that this Ambaſſador, to recommend himſelf to M. de Chamillard, had ſpread all ſorts of Calumnies againſt me, for 'tis certain, that the Day before he made the foreſaid Anſwer to the Father Recollect, he ſent to all the publick Houſes in the City that are frequented by Gentlemen, to forbid in the King's Name and his own, all French Officers to ſee me and converſe with me. And indeed thoſe of the ſaid Officers, who before made their Court to me, and loaded me with Careſſes, began from that Day to ſhun and flye me worſe than an Enemy. This Prohibition was equally injurious to my Reputation and to the Liberty of the Republick; for ſuppoſe even that I had engag'd my ſelf in the Emperour's Service, which I had not, 'tis a Cuſtom univerſally eſtabliſh'd, that when Officers of different Parties meet in a neutral Town, they may appear and diſcourſe together in publick Places.

'Thus we have given in this and our Preceeding 'Papers, the Marquis de Langalerie's Enumeration of 'the Injuries done him by M. Chamillard and the Ab'bot de Pompone: He cloſes his Manifeſto with a ſhort 'Recapitulation of thoſe Injuries, and adds to them 'that he was miſreckon'd and wrong'd of 41000 'Livres, which had ſo encreas'd his Debts as to reduce 'him to Indigence. And concludes upon the whole 'Matter, that deſpairing abſolutely of obtaining Par'don and Favour from the Court of France; that the 'Pope having refus'd his Services, and the Republick 'of Venice having no Occaſion for them; and that 'finding himſelf under a Neceſſity of ſerving a new 'Maſter, as well becauſe he wanted Means to ſubſiſt 'in a private Retirement, as becauſe ſuch a Retirement 'did not ſuit his Genius, he thought he could not 'chooſe one more worthy than the Emperour, and 'thereupon determin'd to put himſelf into his Service.
